Teen Girls and Sex.

BOB ABERNETHY , anchor: Now, a special report on the sexual pressures on pre-teenage girls. Parents, social critics, and many young girls themselves deplore it, but sex sells, so advertisers and entertainers use it to attract audiences. They use it without the regulation or social pressures that once were restraining forces. And they use it without censorship, which hardly anyone favors. Mary Alice Williams reports on the media and the children who are its targets.

MARY ALICE WILLIAMS : They're sweet. The sexually debasing lyrics they're mimicking aren't. Ever since Elvis shimmied his pelvis, parents have worried about protecting their teens from the obscene. This is different. These aren't 17-year-olds. They're 11. And these self-confident sixth graders and even their younger siblings are increasingly exposed to torrents of overtly sexual messages by people selling things to preteens.

ALICE (Teenage Girl): It makes me feel like an object and feel really, really weird. And it is not like girls should be like that.

WILLIAMS : The culture tells them something different. They listen to music. Britney Spears made it big wearing a Catholic schoolgirl uniform. Look at her now. Most of BILLBOARD's top 20 CDs are slapped with "Parental Guidance" stickers. They [kids] do homework on the Internet where there are lots of porn sites. They watch TV. The teen hit DAWSON'S CREEK on the WB alludes to oral sex and masturbation. In prime time, the Kaiser Family Foundation has catalogued an average of five sexual references per hour.

KERRY (Teenage Girl): This sexual stuff you don't just see on TV. You see it day to day. It happens in middle school. It will happen in high school. You just see it around.

WILLIAMS : Professor Jean Bethke Elshain is an ethicist with University of Chicago Divinity School.

Dr. JEAN BETHKE ELSHTAIN (University of Chicago Divinity School): There's certainly a relationship between the culture and the increase of sex because of the many cultural messages that bombard young people daily.

WILLIAMS : According to studies, more girls than ever before are sexually active before their 15th birthday. One in 12 children has lost his or her virginity by the eighth grade. Almost a fourth of ninth graders have slept with four or more partners.

Dr. Michael Rich, a pediatrician who treats adolescents only, talks with his teenage patients daily about sexual issues. He says he is seeing more sexually transmitted diseases in younger and younger children and that expectations of sex have changed drastically.

Dr. MICHAEL RICH : What we are seeing now that is different from previous years, I think, is that sex is expected. Sex is part of the normal interaction, day-to-day interaction between boys and girls.

JERRY DELLA FEMINA (Advertising Executive): This is about as sexy as we get.

WILLIAMS : Advertising agent Jerry Della Femina doesn't use sex to sell his clients' products. But he knows why people do.

Mr. DELLA FEMINA : It's easier to be lewd than to be creative, and people try to get attention, and the one thing that gets attention is sex. Sex sells. People turn around. They look at it.

WILLIAMS : Like many in the industry, he thinks it is up to the parents to monitor what their children see and hear.

Mr. DELLA FEMINA : I believe that it is the parents' job to provide them with a sense of values so that if they do see something that is off, they are not affected by it.

WILLIAMS : Diane Levin, with the Coalition to Stop Commercial Exploitation of Children, studies the effect of culture on kids' behavior.

DIANE LEVIN (Coalition to Stop Commercial Exploitation of Children): I have interviewed thousands of parents, and they agree it is their job and they try very hard to do it, but they can't keep it out of their children's lives. I resent that I have to struggle with this issue. I think that in the best of all possible worlds we would have a society that is trying to create an environment that helps parents in their job instead of making it harder.

Dr. ELSHTAIN : At one point in time in this culture, the assumption was that families and churches and schools, and even the wider culture, reinforced one another in helping to sustain children through a period of growing up. And I think that coherence has broken down.

STEPHANIE (Teenage Girl): The sixth graders learned how to do something they are not supposed to do. And it is called “giving booty.”

RACHAEL (Teenage Girl): The girl like gets in front of the guy and the guy is behind her.

CASEY (Teenage Girl): It’s like — I just don’t really want to tell you.

WILLIAMS : Like them, the majority of preteens don’t engage in sexual behavior, but they are aware of what they see around them. Sixth graders know about a concept many of their parents hadn’t heard of till college: oral sex. SEVENTEEN Magazine says 55 percent of teens have engaged in oral sex.

ALICE : According to a lot of people, it keeps you a virgin.

LEA (Teenage Girl): Because it is kind of like having sex, but you are not really doing anything and you can’t have a baby, and they don’t think there is any consequences.

Ms. LEVIN (referring to an ad): Her breasts look like they are about 50 percent of her weight.

WILLIAMS : Using sex to sell products starts early.

Ms. LEVIN : What they are seeing right now is a sexual relationship between males and females that is totally objectified — the sexuality that you see is not in the context of relationships. It is not in the context of caring and feeling. I am very worried about where this is going to lead. There is a whole set of problems that has to do with the relationships males and females are going to develop with each other.

WILLIAMS : What messages are you getting about who you are supposed to be?

CASEY : Perfect — big boobs, hips, a strong stomach, you know, pretty face, no zits.

SARAH (Teenage Girl): So basically stuff that is on the outside. Not on the inside.

WILLIAMS : It’s how these children should be developing on the inside that concerns ethicist Jean Bethke Elshtain.

Dr. ELSHTAIN : To the extent that your time is devoted to engaging in these kinds of activities, it’s taken away from other sorts of possibilities at very crucial ages for young people, when they’re learning how to be to the kinds of adults that they’re going to become.

WILLIAMS : How did it get this far? Television producers, advertisers, movie producers, magazine editors outdoing each other for the big sell — with almost no limits imposed on them.

Ms. LEVIN : The entertainment industry is unethical in its practice of marketing sex and violence to children. They will use whatever techniques they can to capture the attention of an audience so they will be interested and engaged and hopefully buy what is being marketed.

RACHAEL : Everyone has something, you know, that is not perfect about them. So I think that magazines, TV shows should stop putting that message out to everybody.

WILLIAMS : Can you legislate the images coming at our children? Jerry Della Femina doesn’t think so.

Mr. DELLA FEMINA : I don’t like that this is the way we are going as a nation. It is time to censor these people. I don’t want to be part of that.

Dr. ELSHTAIN : People have to get licenses to broadcast. So it seems to me that there’s some way, without in any way moving into real censorship, there are ways that you could set up certain guidelines.

Ms. LEVIN : One of the reasons it is so important that government play some role in regulating and setting standards is that once it becomes a level playing field for the whole industry, then it will help the whole industry become more ethical.

Dr. ELSHTAIN : We have the responsibility to affirm that which is worthy and good about our culture. And there’s so much to affirm. We also have the responsibility to say no, and I think we have to do both in equal measure and find some balance between them.

CASEY : It does rub off on you a lot of times, and it makes you feel that this is the way that you are supposed to be and that guys will like you because you have big boobs, and then after a while you think that it is normal.

WILLIAMS : Perhaps normal to adults too, to the extent that they are increasingly desensitized to the saturation of sexual messages and squeamish about talking with their children. Sex education is left to the schools, which are restricted from teaching the realities of oral sex and doing “booty.” But our children are still learning and absorbing values from what they see around them. I’m Mary Alice Williams for RELIGION & ETHICS NEWSWEEKLY in New York.

ABERNETHY : We tried to get comments from people in the TV, magazine, and record businesses who are using sex to sell, but their spokespeople all declined.

To play an MP4 File on your PC, you are required to have a media player that does so. If you are using Windows Media Player version 12, it will be able to play your MP4 Video, but if you have version 11 or below, you will have to install a codec or use a 3rd party media player, such as VLC or QuickTime.

Viral Video Of Mom Beating Daughter Over Facebook Sexploits Highlights Double-Standard.

A mother beat her 16-year-old daughter on camera, opening a larger conversation about how young girls are policed.

Posted July 27, 2016.

A Georgia woman used her daughter's Facebook Live to broadcast herself beating the 16-year-old girl, who was being punished for engaging in sex.

According to The Washington Post, Shanavia Miller found out that her daughter, Nia Green, posted a photo of her towel-clad boyfriend on the social media site. Miller assumed the photo was taken in her home, but Green later confirmed on Facebook that she took the picture at the boy's house.

In the video, which lasts over five minutes, Miller can be seen striking her daughter several times with her hand, sometimes with a switch. At one point she calls her child a “thot.”

“This is my page now,” Miller said near the end. “Now I'm gonna need y'all to send this viral. Please share this because I'm not done. More to come.”

The video was also posted on YouTube and has over 93,000 views. Since then, a spokeswoman from the Savannah-Chatham Metropolitan Police Department told The Post that Miller could face charges. Multiple people forwarded the video to the SPD, urging law enforcement to open an investigation. The video's reception is emblematic of a larger narrative regarding how Black families discipline their children, harkening back to the old adage, “Spare the rod, spoil the child.”

But it hits at a larger conversation about how we police young girls in terms of expressing their sexuality versus young men. While I do think sixteen is young for sexual exploration because of the emotional vulnerability it opens up between two willing participants at any age, there's something more to explore.

I couldn't help but think of the boy involved. How did his parents react if/when they found out about the picture and the video that followed? Will there be a public lashing? It leads me to a phrase my mom uses regarding her upbringing: “Mothers love their sons, but raise their daughters.”

My mother is the oldest of three children, and though she holds the highest regard for my grandmother, she often speaks on the differences between how she was raised compared to how my uncle, her younger brother, was brought up.

Parents are generally concerned with ensuring their female children are protected from exploring their sexuality. Women from a young age are reared to protect their virginity for their husbands, or a “special someone,” while male children are taught that the world is their oyster – insinuating it's fine to pursue as many sexual opportunities as possible.

This frame of thinking is embedded within several cultures and religions, sometimes causing a total opposite effect in how women and men deal with their sexuality and the public discourse surrounding a sexually, self-determined woman and a sexual, sovereign man.

Miller thought she was protecting her daughter from the outside world, but by exposing her punishment publicly, she may have caused more damage than she knows.

14 Best Free Movie Download Sites Of 2021 | Fully Legal.

In this age of digital consumerism, almost nothing is free of cost especially entertainment. And even if there is, they are generally considered pirated or illegal. Over the last decade or so, many media streaming sites have emerged that provides streaming services and allow users to download their favorite movies and television shows but at a cost.

Those who don't want to pay these services are easily attracted by illegal platforms, which provide movies nothing but illegally. Non-genuine platforms, including most torrent sites not only makes you liable for legal charges, but there is an imminent threat of malware attacks to your personal devices. So what options we are left with? From where we can download all those movies?

Well, there are few genuine websites out there that allows you to watch/download movies and TV series legally and absolutely for free. Let's start with 14 best free movie download sites.

14. Tubi.

Tubi is a San Francisco based video-on-demand platform that provides free access to hundreds and hundreds of TV shows and movies. Currently, it has more than 200 content providers, including several big ones like Paramount Pictures, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and Lionsgate.

The platform brings new movies and shows every week. Apart from its website, users can access Tubi from Chromecast and other over the top services like as Roku, Apple TV and Amazon Fire TV.

13. Classic Cinema Online.

If you love old, classic movies like me, then you may already know that most of those movies are not really easy to find. Yes, you can always search them on video sharing websites like YouTube and Dailymotion but it takes hours before you find something that you really want to watch.

Classic Cinema Online solves this problem. Instead of spending long hours, you can simply watch hand picked movies across different genres. It lets you explore decades-old movies by categories so that you can easily find what you're actually looking for.

12. Dailymotion.

Dailymotion is the second biggest video hosting service after YouTube. It allows its users to browse, upload and download video contents from all over the world. Here you can find a great variety of content from old movies to useful documentaries.

Dailymotion, however, has suffered some legal setbacks over the years. Back in 2014, the platform was fined $1.5 million after it was found guilty of copyright infringement. In Russia, the platform has been blocked nationwide since early 2017 after a court ruling. It was accused of continually violating country's copyright law.

11. PopcornFlix.

PopcornFlix is a popular streaming website, where you can watch hundreds of free, legal movies and web series. While the service is primarily focused on independent movies, you can also find brainstorming documentaries and intriguing international films. PopcornFlix is easily accessible from Playstation, Xbox and Roku.

10. Viewster.

Do you like watching independent movies without paying anything? If yes, then Viewster could be perfect for you. It's a popular video-on-demand platform that provides free access to over 12,000 licensed content, including documentaries and anime.

The platform also features hundreds of region-specific television shows like The Inbetweeners, shameless and Peep Show to name just a few. Furthermore, you neither have to register nor have to download a local client to start watching on the website.

9. Yahoo View.

Were you a big fan of Hulu's free version, but really miss it now? If yes, then you might not know about Yahoo View. Well, it is a free video-on-demand platform that function almost in the same way as Hulu did once.

Here you can watch recent (last four) episodes of various popular TV shows from multiple broadcasting networks like NBC, ABC and FOX. But keep in mind that there is a minimum eight day delay from the original broadcast and when it first appears on the platform.

A decent collection of movies is also available, however they are generally unorthodox or non-mainstream. Furthermore, many international sitcoms and anime shows can be enjoyed fully (no four episode limit) with subtitle.

8. Kanopy.

Kanopy is a unique video streaming service that provides free access to a large selection of movies for students from different universities and other educational institutions. To gain access, you need to provide your university library credentials.

This service is currently available only in a few countries, including U.S, Canada, UK and Australia and only to participating libraries. Its completely ads free since partner institutions pay for the films watched by their faculties and students. Unsurprisingly, Kanopy focuses mostly on documentaries, but you can find films from every genre.

7. Pluto TV.

Pluto TV is a free internet based TV platform that provides its users access to over 100 channels which includes new movies and sports channels. Its interface is similar to traditional TV platforms. It brings contents from a total of 75 media partners.

In 2017, Pluto TV included a huge amount of on demand movies along with TV shows after striking a deal with MGM and Warner Bros. Like few other services on the list, Pluto TV might not be available in some locations.

6. Sony Crackle.

Crackle is one of the most popular free video streaming platform that offers licensed content(s) from big media providers such as Universal Studios, Warner Bros and Fox Digital, etc. Right now, it is available in more than 20 different nations in North and South America.

My personal experience with the site is somehow moderate. The interface is simple, helps you navigate easily, however, too many ads might ruin your experience.

5. Vimeo.

Vimeo may not be as big as YouTube, but it sure is popular and has a huge fan base. Here you can enjoy movies and hundreds of entertaining short films. Vimeo has a pretty decent interface with almost no annoying ads. High definition playback support is also there.

Vimeo also provides a video-on-demand service for users who wants to buy full length movies and TV shows. Although most of these are independent films, a number of movies from big production houses are also available. Overall, Vimeo is a perfect platform for those who are looking for both free and creative films and paid content all in one place.

4. Snagfilms.

SnagFilms is another ad-supported video-on-demand website where you can watch hundreds of rare documentaries and independent films. Currently, its entire library is comprised of more than five thousand different titles across different genres. It also features few documentaries created exclusively by National Geographic.

The contents are nicely organized in sections based on genre, so you can explore new movies and TV shows. Also, there is no need for you to register, just find what you want to watch and enjoy.

3. YouTube.

YouTube can be your best companion when there is nothing else to do or watch. And why not, it's the world's largest video-sharing/hosting website, which provides you with visual contents from around the world. Though finding full-length movies on YouTube is extremely difficult nowadays, it still has a sizable amount of free movies that you can watch easily.

Apart from that, there are hundreds of movies which never shows up on the site unless you specifically search for them. Most of the time these movies are not uploaded by their rightful owner and are divided into pieces. Few authorized channels that you can try are Maverick Entertainment and The Paramount Vault.

2. Public Domain Torrents.

One thing that I have learned after years of research is that copyright laws are extremely complex and could cost you millions. We all know that torrents are illegal as they violate international copyright right laws, however, there are still hundreds of torrents available, which you can download legally.

Public Domain Torrents is most probably the only such site that carries movies which are now part of the public domain. This happens when the original creator of a patented material fails to renew their copyright claim after a certain age limit.

Here you can enjoy classic old movies across different genres. The site is very easy to navigate, you just select a category and scroll through until you find something you want. Each movie is available in multiple formats and quality.

1. The Internet Archive.

The Internet Archive is perhaps the best platform from where you can get legal movies and television shows absolutely for free. For those who don't know, it's a not-for-profit digital library which carries millions of contents from books, images, audio files to old games and of course movies.

You would be surprised to know how much data is stored in their data center. Back in 2012, the total amount of data stored in the Internet Archive reached 10 petabytes or 10 million gigabytes. Anyway, it allows users to upload content and its web crawlers make sure that you get something new every time you visit there.

Apart from movies, you can watch and download mini films and short clips from TV shows.

Bipro Das.

Biprojit has been a staff writer at RankRed since 2015. He mainly focuses on game-changing inventions but also covers general science with a particular interest in astronomy. His domain extends to mobile apps and knows a thing or two about finance. Biprojit has a Bachelor of Arts degree from the University of Delhi, majoring in Geography.
