Freemake Video Downloader.

Download videos from YouTube, DailyMotion and similar websites.

Latest version.

Freemake Video Downloader is one of those applications that allows you to download videos from YouTube, Facebook and the rest of similar websites. It works really easy, it's as easy as copy-paste the URL of the video we want to download and choose some download settings.

Choose the format: FLV, MP4, WMV, 3GP and quality and wait for a few seconds (depending on the video length and quality). Then, enjoy your favorite videos offline. You can convert videos into mp3 on the fly, so you can download videoclips as mp3 songs, something interesting if you only like the soundtrack of any video and you want to have it downloaded.

Freemake Video Downloader is a good choice if you need to download streaming videos, and its interface is really pretty.

How can I know which format to choose when saving a video? I want to save videos from my pc to my tablet but my videos are very heavy. Which video format should I choose ?, Mp4 or Android?

Freemake Video Converter Watermark.

Since upgrading Freemake Video Converter to 4.1.0.0 it now inserts a watermark at the end of every converted video. Does anyone know what the first version of freemake was to do this? Like I said it didn't do this until I upgraded the program (which I do every few months).

Secondly does anyone use other programs instead of Freemake? I feel that what they did was unethical. Not because they wanted to put a watermark at the end of converted files, but because of the way it was done (aka nothing in the version release notes or anywhere else). As a result I am ready to drop them if anyone suggest a good alternative.

Okay I was wrong. I only looked at the release notes for the version I upgraded to and didn't read far enough down the list.

I downgraded for the time being but I am looking to switch.

Source files are mostly mp4's and wmv's. Watermark videos in another program and have to covert watermarked output to MP4, WMV, and FLV (which is done right now in Freemake).

Freemake Video Converter without Logo?

Even if someone can answer that - logic dicatates that it would be Version 3.xxxxxx - how could you possibly obtain that version ?.

The program has been removed from this site and there has been plenty of discussion of it being not safe.

There are plenty of other converters out there without logos etc. Better to learn to use these than rely on some 'one-click' solution.

Thank you for writing, but it is not the answer I am looking for, unfortunately. There are still a few sites online offering the old versions of Freemake Video Converter: Afterdawn; pcworld and Oldversion.com to name three.

So, I am still interested to know: Can anybody please tell me which was the first version to introduce the watermark Logo at the end of a 5 minute duration video? Thank you.

View Profile View Forum Posts Private Message.

One other thought. Do not take what is written in the update notes as gospel - you can see that your version already includes the logos. What if ALL versions included this restriction ?.

A logic will say that this so. Why would a program provide un-restricted useage when the whole point is to sell the darn thing ?.

View Profile View Forum Posts Private Message.

Then download one of the versions that these sites promote/make available.

If you can convert a video longer than 5 minutes without logos then do provide value to the forum by providing the link.

1. Buy the Gold License, I did.

2. Delete the image branding folder located in C:\Program Files (x86)\Freemake\Freemake Video Converter\FMCommon\ConverterCommon\Resources.

And there is somat else in me that says that this 5 min issue has always been there.

The whole purpose is to sell the darn thing. Why give useage over a full video ?

@dfisher052 Vidcoder main and only advantage is batch processing. In every other aspect I would prefer avidemux. Detailed settings (using sliders or typing numbers) of main codecs, supporting Nvenc (not much detailed settings) and much better AAC codec, which is poor in Vidcoder. Also better filters. Possibility made visual cuts. Similar is VD2.

I've been using Freemake Video Converter for about 7 years. It suits what I do, with a big interface and simple operation on very long recordings. I have security software which I believe safeguards me from Freemake's PUPs and other nosiness. The fact that I'm still using it is testament to how much I value it.

I can't be exact, but around the introduction of Version4 Freemake took a serious dive in usability. The thing that affected me worst was the inability to navigate thru long recordings and cut clips along the way - now, every time you click you stop being able to see your video in motion as you scroll along the timeline to make the next cut - you have to save your selection and get the original file back up to make the next selection. (If you can't visualise what I'm talking about, I apologise, can't do better.) I reported it to Freemake as a bug, and they replied "It's not a bug, it's how it works now". Did they come up against copyright problems?

I therefore reverted to Version3, and what I lost on the swings I more than gained on the roundabouts.

Until . Less than a year ago Freemake stymied Version3 somehow, it will no longer work.

Then, in December 2017, restrictions were put on length of clips and number of clips to join, and a "waiting time" was required in the free version.

From the website today - billox!

This is an example of what I was seeing when I investigated speeding up:

However, they sometimes do a very special offer where you can buy a licence for all packs for under $10 (💎10), and I have managed to collect 3 such licences.

I do wonder if Freemake's Russian owners have long-term plans to spread mayhem internationally, but I need it.
